

1 degree of Capricorn: 'An Indian chief claims power from the assembled tribe'

Here a group is called upon to acknowledge the power of the individual within the group. There is boldness in claiming such power from an assembly of people who may or may not agree on one's audacious plan.

Indian chiefs were chosen for their courage in battle and their skills as hunters and horsemen. An Indian chief is not someone who passively inherits the responsibilities and privileges the way kings do, by birth right, but rather by displaying the virtues which are deemed essential to rule.

A confident person can become master of his/her destiny, irrespective of the collective conditioning of the prevalent culture (tribe). Individual qualities and strengths are important and therefore take priority here.
